The activities of the proteasome in etiolated hypocotyls of seedlings of tomato cv. Sannoura were examined by means of activity-specific assays and immunoblotting. Treatment of etiolated seedlings with protein synthesis inhibitor cycloheximide leads to accumulation of phytochrome. This accumulation of phytochrome is accompanied by the formation of polyubiquitinated proteins. Treatment with proteasome inhibitor E-64c causes an increase in the level of polyubiquitinated proteins. Exposure of etiolated seedlings to red light leads to a decrease in the level of phytochrome and concomitant decrease in the levels of polyubiquitinated proteins. The decrease in phytochrome levels is prevented by the pretreatment of the seedlings with E-64c. These results suggest that the light 2d92ce491b
