Zinc is an essential trace element required for a wide variety of biological processes and has been shown to play a role in a number of neurological and psychiatric disorders. Treatment with zinc salts has been shown to improve some symptoms associated with psychiatric disorders including the negative symptoms of schizophrenia and agitation in dementia. The mechanism of action of zinc in these disorders is thought to be via the modulation of glutamatergic and dopaminergic signalling. In this article, we will review the current literature on the role of zinc in psychiatric disorders, discuss the potential mechanisms of action of zinc and evaluate the current literature on the use of zinc for treating psychiatric disorders.Nursing and rehabilitation - A mixed methods study to establish the feasibility of a new approach for stroke patients with cognitive impairments: The M-Stroke approach. There is a high incidence of cognitive impairments after stroke. The intervention M-Stroke, a new approach for patients with cognitive impairments, aims to enhance the effects of neurorehabilitation. In this mixed methods study, we explored the feasibility of M-Stroke for stroke patients with cognitive impairments and the effects of M-Stroke on the patients' outcomes. Patients with cognitive impairments were included. First, we used quantitative methods to explore feasibility. In the second phase of the study, patients were included based on the inclusion criteria for the M-Stroke approach. Next, we used qualitative methods to explore how patients experienced M-Stroke and effects of M-Stroke. In total, we included 47 patients. Data were collected from March 2017 to January 2018. A majority of the patients reported that they could do the M-Stroke intervention on the days that they attended the rehabilitation centre. They also reported that they found the M-Stroke
