Three out of four voters in a poll released Monday said they would be more likely to vote for a Libertarian candidate, compared with a Democrat or Republican, if their candidate was on the ballot in their area. The poll conducted for the Libertarian Party on behalf of the Cato Institute and YouGov released Monday, showed that while the right wing of the Republican Party is ascendant, the majority of voters would be more inclined to support a Libertarian candidate, especially if their candidate were their local party's nominee. The poll showed that while 22 percent of voters said they would favor a Democrat if their candidate won the party's nomination, just 15 percent said the same for a Republican. Overall, Cato's survey showed that 21 percent of respondents said they'd support a Libertarian candidate if they were on the ballot. For the next nationwide survey by the three parties involved in the Libertarian presidential nomination process, the combined support for the major candidates is expected to be a more even split -- Gary Johnson at 24 percent support and Jill Stein at 12 percent. "Our polling shows voters do have strong views about the two party duopoly in Washington, D.C., and its impact on real people," said Nick Gillespie, editor-in-chief of Reason magazine. "Turnout in off-year elections is usually in the 30 percent or low 40 percent range. A Libertarian Party candidacy is an opportunity to prod voters into thinking about the ideas that underlie the duopoly and provide a vehicle to harness their energy." There are a number of reasons libertarians, including Johnson, have been able to draw support from voters, said Gillespie. "A lot of it has to do with the country's economic crisis," he said. "People are questioning their traditional political beliefs and what other parties have to offer. A lot of people are saying, 'I don't want to vote for Donald Trump or Hillary Clinton.' That is an opportunity for libertarians." The same poll showed that a majority of Americans -- 59 percent -- say that they have little or no confidence that Trump, or Clinton or Sanders, will be able to overcome the influence of money in politics. The poll also showed that Johnson's biggest challenge is the same as Clinton's and Sanders': getting voters to recognize him as the party's nominee before the general election. "All three of them have to get their names in this space," said Libertarian Party National Chairman Nicholas Sarwark. "No one has

Q: Video Codec Safe Across Windows and Mac I'm looking at the FFMpeg and X264 libraries, specifically the FFMpeg library for the compression and the X264 library for the encoding. My question is which one is most safe and reliable. I need to compress a video recorded with the webcam onto the PC and transfer it over wifi to a mobile iOS app. I was wondering which codec would be the most reliable to be able to transfer across both operating systems. I'm not looking for a specific answer, I'm just curious if this is an okay choice. A: The situation is unfortunately complex. There is a list of video codecs here, which is maintained by the Fraunhofer. There are many aspects here: All systems work differently when it comes to the codecs themselves. Windows uses those codecs and so does iOS - but macOS tries to use a different set of codecs, and so do some Windows programs. If you do not make it MPEG then some of the properties of the codec may change. The Fraunhofer list offers no compatibility guarantees at all. A different list of properties is offered by the page Video Compression Guidelines. All the video codecs currently have license terms prohibiting copying. Unfortunately this means that any software that you use has to check for license enforcement before it does any work, and also use a different copy of the codec if it detects an enforcement notice. This can be annoying and make it hard to debug, but it is unavoidable. If you use a codec with a license that forbids license enforcement, then you don't have any of the annoying issues about enforcement notice, but you lose the ability to detect modifications to the codec. This means it will be much harder for your software to maintain compatibility with changes to the codec. You can't even detect changes to the codec as an "update", because any software that used it already lost the compatibility. Mac systems will also have a bitrate limit, because Macs are (sometimes) not as powerful as PCs. Mac users usually have a larger range of video hardware, including such devices as game consoles. This makes it easier for them to use some codecs that are not available on PCs. All of this is very complicated. The result is that there are no codecs that are safe and cross-platform. Windows and Mac always have to use the same ones,
