The effects of 13-cis-retinoic acid on the differentiation of human pre-B ALL cells. 13-Cis-retinoic acid (13cRA), which is a potent retinoid in mediating growth arrest and differentiation, showed significant activity against human pre-B ALL cells in vitro and in vivo. Using immunophenotypic analysis, phenotypic characterization, and morphological criteria, the effects of 13cRA were shown to be extensive and rapid. Blastic transformation was inhibited when the retinoic acid-treated cells were induced to terminally differentiate by butyrate. Although most of the cells differentiated into plasma cells, all of the blastic clones studied so far have not been able to differentiate into macrophages. Cells exposed to 10<sup>-6</sup> M 13cRA for 3 days and then treated with butyrate for 48 hours were 90% macrophage free, whereas untreated controls were only approximately 25% macrophage free. The effects of 13cRA were similar to those of all-trans-retinoic acid. The acute toxicity of 13cRA was associated with the nature of its peripheral distribution. It is possible to obtain therapeutic doses of 13cRA in a complex system without acute toxicity. The present invention relates to a method for manufacturing a commutator ring having a core and a carbon fiber which covers the core. Commutator rings are generally made by layering carbon fibers on a core of brass or other material, and plating a thin layer of copper on the carbon fiber layer. In order to maintain a constant thickness of the copper plating layer, a step of heat treatment is performed after the plating. Recently, it has been desired to manufacture commutator rings at lower cost. In order to increase the manufacturing efficiency, it is desirable that the coating of carbon fibers be thin, i.e. the carbon fiber layer be as thin as possible. However, when carbon fibers of uniform thickness are 3e33713323
