A monoclonal antibody (MAb) was produced by immunizing mice with CD19+ human peripheral blood lymphocytes with the purpose of identifying antigens associated with the phenotypic characteristics of human B lymphocytes. The hybridoma, designated 4G7, secreted a MAb that recognized a cell surface antigen on a subpopulation of B cells, the majority of which was CD19+. The antigen could also be detected on a small proportion of CD19- cells, but at levels several times lower than on CD19+ cells. In contrast, CD21+, FcR+ cells, monocytes and granulocytes were negative for the antigen. The antigen could be detected at the earliest stages of B cell development, in both the early (CD34+) and later (CD34-) subsets of CD19+ cells, but appeared to be absent in CD19+/CD21- cells. A few CD19+/CD21+ cells were also negative for the antigen. The antigen could be detected on up to 50% of CD19+/CD20+ cells. In lymph nodes, the antigen was expressed on up to 75% of CD19+ cells. When B cells were activated, such as by treatment with the B cell mitogen PWM, the antigen was also expressed on
