This is generally believed to result in accumulation of intracellular Na⁺ and reduction of the resting membrane potential. However, this effect is found only at [Ca²⁺]_o less than or equal to 100 nM. At higher $[Ca^{2+}]_o$, the decrease in potential is not predicted by the interaction between Ca^{2+} and Na^+ on the Na^+ pump, since Na^+ is transported two to three times more effectively in the presence of millimolar Ca^{2+} than in its absence. Furthermore, tracings of sodium currents vs. membrane voltage show that when $[Ca^{2+}]_o$ is reduced from 1.1 to 0.1 mM, the pump inactivation is unaffected by Ca^{2+} . We propose that the primary effect of intracellular Ca^{2+} is to suppress $Na(+)-Ca^{2+}$ exchange in skeletal muscle. The most probable physiological implication is a decrease in the rate of fatigue of the Na^{+} - Ca^{2+} exchange system. At lower $[\text{Ca}^{2+}]_o$, Ca^{2+} could be acting by either a direct or an indirect action. U.S.A.
