This invention relates to large format electrographic printing apparatus and methods for use therewith. The use of large format electrographic printers for the printing of long format graphic and graphical information is well known. An example of such a system is a system sold by Xerox Corporation and known as the "Elecpoint" system. This system employs a large format inkjet printhead, the printhead being mounted on a carriage for movement along the platen of the apparatus. The printhead is moved in a line-by-line fashion to produce a long-format print (such as the print produced by a printing press) by depositing ink from the printhead onto an image receiving sheet. The printhead used in this system is of the so-called "drop-on-demand" type, in which a single ink drop is generated by the printhead per electrical signal. The printhead is scanned across the width of the image receiving sheet by the relative movement of the platen with respect to the printhead. The scan speed is sufficient to keep up with the production
