In this proposal, we propose to identify and validate a small molecular weight immunotherapeutic (SMWI) for colon cancer. A wide variety of pre-clinical and clinical studies have demonstrated that tumor-associated antigens are key components of solid tumors and that anti-tumor immunity can be elicited by vaccination using peptides derived from tumor associated antigens. However, cancer immunotherapies have to date been hampered by lack of fundamental understanding of the antigens and mechanisms of tumor rejection. In addition, current models for tumor immunotherapy are often characterized by autologous tumor cells and not heterogeneous tumors. Therefore, there is little clinical validation of the cellular and molecular mechanisms of tumor rejection. Our development of a novel assay to identify novel tumor-specific antigens in colon cancer and our immune monitoring platform that permitted us to follow tumor-specific immunity in patients over time, created a unique opportunity to identify novel tumor antigens in humans. Using the platform to characterize tumor-specific immune responses to the SMWI that we identified we will be able to move towards identification and validation of clinical applications for the SMWI in the clinic. In this proposal, we will identify and validate novel cancer antigens derived from the human colon that generate CD8+ and CD4+ responses. Preliminary data have also demonstrated that peptide vaccination can elicit both CD8+ and CD4+ responses in human colon cancer, and that CD4+ T cells are critical for CD8+ T cell-mediated tumor rejection. This proposal is designed to expand these findings to identify novel colon antigens that induce tumor rejection by breaking tolerance in mice and humans. We will develop a platform to assess the cellular responses and outcome of the different colon SMWIs in the mouse and human tumor models. We will then validate that the colon cancer SMWIs elicit the appropriate response in murine and human tumor models, and importantly, assess whether colon cancer SMWIs elicit CD4+ and CD8+ responses in humans and which CD4+ and CD8+ responses are critical for tumor rejection. The proposed studies provide the basis for a novel approach to colon cancer immunotherapy and the first real hope for effective colon cancer immunotherapy in humans. An interaction between the nuclear RNA polymerases II and III during phage lambda DNA replication.
