I need to set up a website, but not sure how and I am not finding any good tutorials on this. I'm a bit of a newbie. I need to set up a virtual host on Ubuntu 14.04 to host a Node.JS application called "Palindrome" that I will run. A: To begin with you need to understand what a "virtual host" is. A "virtual host" is a name server on your computer that is unique to your computer. It can therefore be used as the website address for your computer without any further configuration (unless you add another server somewhere else). Each virtual host has its own IP address that is unique to that host. The IP address is the IP address of your computer + the domain name. So for example, you might have a virtual host that gets the address 192.168.1.1 and a domain name of foo.example.com, then that host's IP address is 192.168.1.1 + foo.example.com. If you have another host with the domain name bar.example.com, that host's IP address would be 192.168.1.2 + bar.example.com. This all happens on your computer, and there is no actual name server involved. The only server involvement is you tell your computer to serve the domain. For example, if you wanted to access your virtual host called foo.example.com at the IP address 192.168.1.1, you would type in 192.168.1.1 in your web browser. This is the process you want your computer to perform and the process that is run through the name server. In the example of foo.example.com, this is what is happening. Now what do you need a name server for? You need name servers so that when someone types in your website address in their web browser (for example, the computer can look up your domain name (foo.example.com) in a name server, and then send them a reply telling them to go to the right website
