As computer networks and data networks proliferate, the prevalence of worms, viruses, and other computerized threats increases. Users are therefore increasingly interested in obtaining information about network traffic. Network traffic information may be used to identify threats and to assess network security. At the same time, users have a desire to obtain such information as dynamically as possible to improve the user experience. In order to obtain information about network traffic, many users rely on network monitoring devices that are coupled to a local area network. Such network monitoring devices typically obtain information about network traffic by monitoring and capturing the packets being transmitted across the local area network. One problem with capturing packets, however, is that an authorized user may be blocked from accessing the network monitoring device. For example, if a user is logged on to a network monitoring device, the user may have a desire to perform operations that require access to the device. If the user is prevented from accessing the device, the user may be forced to disconnect and reconnect the user's connection. This may cause the user inconvenience and slow the performance of operations requiring access to the device. Accordingly, there is a need for techniques that enable a user to obtain dynamic information about network traffic without having to use a network monitoring device. The researchers said they tried to mix human stem cells with pig embryonic stem cells, injecting the mixture into a pig's embryo. The pigs, of course, didn't produce chimeras. But this was only because they weren't given the right cocktail of substances to induce the human cells to grow into fetal pigs.
