c18a082122 ghid de conversatie roman francez.rarQ: Isn't ssh pubkey authentication done by the client and not the server? Trying to understand something. There's a minimum set of commands a client has to send to the server to get a server authenticated: Receive public key (obviously). Login. Process the command sent by the client. Wouldn't that mean that the client is the one who is authenticating the server? Aren't the server and client supposed to work like a traditional client-server architecture? A: The difference is that in client-server protocols the protocol is split in two parts: the client is connected to the server by a network connection, and runs a client protocol which requires authentication. The server provides a service, and sometimes initiates a connection to the client. In SSH the client and the server are one and the same. That's also the reason why they are called "authentication" in the technical sense, because the client and the server are one and the same. Their network connection and SSH connection is called "authentication". But the server doesn't authenticate the client, because he/she isn't a client. The client handles three things: He/she receives credentials which the server has sent (e.g. the public key). He/she logs in to the server and starts a session. He/she handles incoming commands. The server handles one thing: He/she receives credentials which the client has sent (e.g. the public key) and requests a login. He/she receives a command, and handles it. A: At the client, you authenticate to the server. At the server, the server authenticates to the client. Of course, once you have authenticated to a server you can then login to its services. But authentication and login are two separate things. Achieving authentication to a server is basically the first step in accessing its services. For example, by connecting to a server you may not even know what the server has to offer. That's the reason public key authentication is so important. A public key is a "password." It lets someone decide if the key they received belongs to the person they claim it belongs to. It doesn't make them their user ID,
