Lactobacillus gasseri is a coliform that produces butyrate from lactose. The invention provides a new method of producing butyrate from lactose. An example method of the invention thus comprises: cultivating a cell culture comprising Lactobacillus gasseri; and recovering butyrate from cell culture. The invention also provides a method of producing butyrate from lactose, the method comprising: cultivating a culture of one or more organisms comprising Lactobacillus gasseri; and recovering butyrate from the culture. However, the invention is not limited to methods of producing butyrate from lactose, and may be applied to producing butyrate from many other substrates. Lactobacillus gasseri is a member of the lactic acid bacteria, which are widely used in the food industry for their fermentative properties. The species exhibits good acidification activity and survive low-pH conditions associated with food processing. Also, L. gasseri is one of the most widely studied organisms in dairy fermentation owing to its ability to produce butyric acid. It is one of the first butyrate producers discovered from dairy-derived substrates and can also produce small amounts of acetate and lactate by-products. L. gasseri has also been shown to have high tolerance to milk proteins and is able to decrease the content of lactose in dairy products by converting it to butyric acid. Its ability to reduce lactose gives L. gasseri a high potential for the production of butyrate and lactate. 82138339de
