In response to RBC transfusion, platelets have been shown to play a critical role in the pathogenesis of transfusion-related acute lung injury (TRALI).

We hypothesize that platelets are also active in TRALI. We developed a cell transfer model in rats. Transfusion of platelets obtained from a donor rat reduced the survival time of a recipient rat. The survival time of recipients was significantly longer when platelets were pretreated with arachidonic acid (AA)-induced aggregating, or with platelet-activating factor (PAF) antagonists. In contrast, pretreatment of platelets with the phosphodiesterase inhibitor 3-isobutyl-1-methyl-xanthine (IBMX) or inosine 5'-monophosphate (IMP) delayed the survival time. We also examined whether inflammatory responses were induced in the lungs of rats by transfusing platelets. The expression of interleukin-6 in the lungs increased when the rats received transfusions of platelets pretreated with PAF antagonists. The expression of adhesion molecules in the lungs was up-regulated by transfusion of platelets pretreated with PAF antagonists. These results indicate that platelets, as well as RBC, are involved in the pathogenesis of TRALI/acute respiratory distress syndrome. The involvement of platelets in TRALI is suggested to be associated with PAF-mediated
