The sharp rise in home values in recent years has caught the attention of some lawmakers and regulators in North Carolina, where the average home sold for just over $200,000 in October. That was up more than 40 percent from the average during the last year of the George W. Bush administration, according to U.S. Census Bureau data. In South Carolina, the average price is more than $225,000. The increase has been tempered by worries that higher values could change the way many people buy homes. That could lead to bubbles and crashes in the future. And some economists believe the recent run-up could be exacerbated by a weakening economy. “There’s no doubt that there is a large degree of pent-up demand,” said Jennifer Kuzma, chief U.S. economist at the J.P. Morgan Private Bank. “One concern is that the homes have become too expensive for people who were on the fence about buying a home before the recent price increase.” Kuzma said the increase in prices could easily prove to be temporary. But if home sales and prices increase for years to come, it could hurt employment. “If we see a market correction over the next year or two, it could potentially undermine job creation” over the next decade, she said. Relatively few homes have sold in many parts of the country over the past several years. The rate of sales has edged up this year, a good sign for some economists. The supply of homes on the market is still depressed. In October, sales of newly built homes — those priced under $250,000 — were at their lowest level in seven years, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. That's reflected in the numbers for all U.S. home sales and listed prices. Sales for existing homes fell again in October to the lowest level in 12 years, according to the National Association of Realtors. That's particularly worrisome for a nation where the vast majority of homes are owned.

Prices for existing homes have risen
steadily in recent years, up 32
percent since
hitting a low of $153,300 in September 2008.
Rising prices are

good for buyers,
but they could also
be good for sellers.
Homes that are
appraised at higher prices also fetch
higher offers,
which could boost
prices even higher.
So far, though,
