Developments in the field of video have created a need for improved techniques for summarizing and presenting information contained in video signals. In video, since the amount of information is immense, it is not useful to require human intervention to obtain succinct summaries. A number of systems have been developed for recognizing a few important events, scenes, or portions of the video image and synthesizing a representation of the video image as a brief summary. The applications are not limited to video but also encompass other media, such as still images, graphics and audio. There is a broad variety of summarization algorithms and techniques for representing video. Generally, the summarization technique is divided into two main categories: bottom-up and top-down. The bottom-up approach is typically a sequential process that identifies a set of events, moving objects and camera motion (in video) by comparing one frame against the next. Such an approach is well suited for summarizing many video sequences, but is computationally intensive and requires the viewer to have some knowledge of the structure of the sequence. Further, as it compares frames against each other, it fails to take advantage of the relation of the individual frames in time. A top-down approach is one that generates a summary without frame by frame comparisons, but uses knowledge or model of the structure of the sequence. A frequently used such structure is a shot-by-shot synopsis. These approaches are further divided into two categories: frame-based techniques and scene-based techniques. The frame-based techniques are more effective in identifying a limited number of events, such as shots, key frames, or objects, while the scene-based techniques provide a greater control of the summary and are usually less computationally demanding. Each of the approaches, such as frame-based techniques and scene-based techniques, have their relative advantages and disadvantages. A summary which is too small is not sufficient to effectively communicate the important events, scenes or portions of the video image and may even distort or confuse the essence of the original video. The generated summaries are often too long and too wordy to effectively communicate the important information.
