[b]The Double Down Cake[/b].Integrating water treatment and source water protection: a case study in Slovenia. Slovenia has been at the forefront of EU-wide efforts for several years to control pollution of its surface waters. Its implementation of Directive 76/160/EEC has produced important results, but its progress has been hindered by the greater flexibility offered by domestic law in use of water conservation measures than by EU law. The creation of a statutory framework should address these limitations, but no such framework has been developed for the purpose. In 2007, a national project was launched with the aim of developing a statutory framework for implementation of the Directive and could thus be the first step towards integration of water pollution control and water treatment in the future. The project integrated a national water management conference, a national workshop and a series of semi-structured interviews. Finally, the results of the research were fed into policy-makers' discussion on future levels of ambition for Slovenian surface water and drinking water protection. The paper presents the main outcomes of the project and suggestions for a stronger integration of water treatment and source protection.

I have a WPF app which saves the state of a tree control on an ini file using the EF Core in-memory provider (I cache the file by building a List. In the next version of the app I plan to save the state to a more durable SQLite file. I would prefer not to change the schema, and would therefore like to simply change the file type. However, the SQLite provider doesn't support the in-memory provider, since it's not a database. So I would need to have the file in a standard file format, and then write out the contents to the database. My question is: can I write out the file to the database, say in the commit phase, and then write out the full contents of the file to an existing file of the correct type, say the new SQLite file, in the draw phase? A: No, the DrawPhase is called before the CommitPhase. But you can implement a custom SaveOptionsTracker, which stores the file, then in the DrawPhase the SaveOptionsTracker will be called again and it will read the file from the cache, then the CommitPhase will be called and the SaveOptionsTracker will be updated with the new location of the file. Q: Exercise about linking hash tables and hash sets? My task is to build a hash table in C++ by combining a hash set and a hash table. The hash set is implemented by a hash function and I can't use anything other than basic data structure. The hash table is used for storing the values and the hash set is used to filter the values. I have the following code: class HashSet; class HashTable
