electromagnetics manual de solución pdf].Limitations in the granular hypothesis of social perception in rhesus monkeys. Rhesus monkeys were taught to discriminate between a male identity (M) and an object in a novel display (S), which later changed to an identity-like object (M''). S and M shared a large majority of visual aspects when distinct, but differed in physical aspects such as the shape of their relevant colors. When a subject began to identify the display objects from a novel perspective, she tended to confine her decision to the element that she had been trained to recognize as the same identity (M). She also provided the same perceptual interpretation of M and S. When M'' was added to the mixture and became familiar, she began to confine her decision to M'' more than M in response to the novel display. However, she continued to provide the same perceptual interpretation for M and S. Subjects also tended to confine their decision to the same identity that had been in the mixture for a long time. These results are interpreted as evidence that subjects combine perceptual information on their memories of a visual stimulus to determine the identity of the stimulus
