Q: How to know if a contact form is receiving email from the client I have a contact form on my website where the user enters there details and hits submit, the text area then gets converted to a regular text email and is sent out to me, this works correctly for the most part. However I have the email coming directly from the client, if the client wishes to send a message directly to me, his email address will be put into the text area and he hits submit, this works fine. Is there a way I can view the original message that he used to enter his details, ie the one that will be sent to me and not his direct message? I have a capture of the post from php, so I could figure out what the data is and then see what the message was originally. However, I'd like to avoid having to capture each and every email. Any suggestions?

A: Not that I know of, but the best way I know to deal with this is to: Make sure you capture the "mail" request, and save it in your database. Save the users email in the database too. In the next email, when you send out, pull it from the database That way, as long as you have their emails, you can always direct them.
