Because we have been locked out of communicating with our Republic of Ireland counterparts since we decided to stand on the right side of history by joining the European Union, over the past few years Ireland has become very famous. It is, to be fair, a beautiful place, with lovely beaches and fresh green hills. It would certainly be a nice place to visit if you didn't have to live there. I have visited Ireland several times, and each time I have been treated to the gaiety and bounty of the Emerald Isle, of which Dublin is the capital. I am also familiar with Ireland's other cities: Cork, Galway, Kildare and Navan. I know a lot about it. For example, I know that the Dublin weather is fair, but not too cold. I know that the Dublin taxis will happily carry a bag or two, so long as you pay promptly. I know that the Dublin public transport is excellent, a very safe way of travelling anywhere in the city, and well-suited to carrying heavy luggage. And I know that no one in the Dublin public transport system will try to take money off you because it's your birthday or your first day at school. In contrast, I know very little about the United States. So when it comes to admitting Irish entry into the United States of America, I am in my element. Also, I am very proud to be an Irishman. My own father was born in Derry, and his father was born in Banbridge. No American-born Irishman I've ever met has been anything other than warm and welcoming towards me. Should Ireland be admitted to the United States of America? The short answer is, no. As usual, this piece is rather more detailed than most other non-muscular-globe pieces. Some of it is based on fairly obvious comparisons between the two countries. To begin with, we are not the same country. We are both very rich. We both have a very active central government that spends money. We both have a big defence capability, though the Irish have been a bit more restrained in using it than Americans. We are also both surrounded by water. A few years ago, I bumped into a man who had been to the American West Coast and come back. He had been struck by the fact that much of it was actually surrounded by water. This is not the case with the Irish Republic. The other major difference is
