If you use Photoshop, keep the following in mind: * Use Camera Raw: One of Photoshop's best features is the Camera Raw (free) plug-in for Adobe's Creative Suite. It enables you to see the camera-imaging characteristics of raw files, and apply (or tweak) those features. It also offers JPEG conversion and a few other adjustments. The plug-in is an easy way to see how your images came to be as they did. Read more about it in Chapter 10. * Open images in the right format: Photoshop doesn't make it easy to open and save your files in the right formats. Don't open an image, then edit and save it and expect Photoshop to open it without complaint. If you use the Windows version of Photoshop, you can make things easy. In Windows, Right-click the image file to open it in Windows Explorer, and then open the file in Photoshop. In Macintosh Photoshop, open the image file by pressing the Shift key and clicking the image file in the Photo Bin.

A coalition of seven of the nation's largest credit reporting agencies (CRAs) have come out in support of the FCC's proposed Title II rule that would require broadband companies to treat all web traffic equally, regardless of whether it's data or voice. The new rule "is not the end all and be all. However it will go a long way in leveling the playing field to encourage broadband deployment in rural America," according to TechNet's group director of information technology policy, Christian Dulac. He said the rule is especially important in light of recent allegations that AT&T has been throttling web traffic, and other aspects of the proposed rules could have a significant impact. "Regardless of whether it's data or voice, the very idea that we have different rules for different traffic is antithetical to competition," Dulac said. "I think the problem in the back and forth between the broadband providers and the CRAs has been that the CRAs had not yet been moving to compliance with this regulation." Open internet rules for wired and wireless networks have been a hot-button issue for years now, with lawmakers and consumer groups on both sides of the aisle calling for heavy regulatory and enforcement efforts on broadband providers for poor customer experience. AT&T announced late last month that it would impose a reduction of three lines of downstream bandwidth during peak hours. On Tuesday, the National Cable and Telecommunications Association argued that the FCC's proposed rules will drive up costs for consumers and "destroy" net neutrality, despite the large number of companies that support the rules. Verizon and Comcast have come out strongly in favor of the new open internet rules. "The public is increasingly recognizing that net neutrality rules are necessary," Dulac said, adding that the unanimous release of the coalition's statement indicates that CRAs are finally beginning to catch up with the rest of the country on the issue. "As a result it's very clear that the CRAs believe strongly that the rules need to be put in place." Still, some in the industry have remained skeptical that the new rules will have much of a significant impact on broadband customers. "While I believe the proposed rules would mean certain levels of service for customers regardless of whether they are a business or consumer, I do not believe they will prevent or change a negative relationship many consumers have with their broadband provider," Open Internet Coalition (OIC) Executive Director Erika Feller said in a statement. "The vast majority of consumers have not shared my belief
