One person's rocky relationship with cats is another person's purring companion. Or is it? The age-old question of whether cats prefer to be with people or other cats has long been debated in earnest online communities (see the posts below for quick-and-easy science-based fact-checking). But there's another question that's just as juicy and personal: Do people use cats as a way to cope with relationship struggles, work-related stresses, or something else entirely? If you're struggling with any kind of relationship and feeling overwhelmed, learning how to bond with a cat can work as a stress-reliever, says Stephanie Neudert, a certified cat-behavior consultant and founder of the CatFusion YouTube channel. Neudert, who specializes in helping people bond with their cats, says it's a great way to practice having a new type of relationship with an animal, which is similar to how people often talk about relationships with friends. And, she says, cats are more approachable than some of the animals we commonly keep as pets—dogs, for example—so they make great companions for anyone who's having trouble connecting with another species. "A cat can be a great transition. It's fun, playful, and loyal," says Neudert, adding that cats are great because they're receptive to almost all kinds of interaction. "If you're having trouble feeling comfortable with another being, a cat is the perfect accessory. It's something I highly recommend." The basic idea behind "CatFusion" is that it's easy to form bonds with a cat by providing it with quality, frequent interactions
