If you have been following along, you will remember that we initially released the replacement display on March 2. On that day, we completed the first batch of prints. The print was sent to our head printer for quality control. He came back with a handful of minor tweaks to be implemented to make the display better. He sent another batch to be printed, which went to QA for quality control. Finally, on March 10, the replacement display was released on our website. The first batch of replacement displays went to our head printer to be re-assembled and ready to ship. We had planned on having everything ship by April 2, but the last few shipments were stuck at customs, a process which typically requires the customer to pay a penalty fee at this time of year. We're happy to say that we did not have to pay the customs fee (we estimate that the fee on the parts would be around $800). It was not until June that we were given access to the printer in China, and we needed to replace the P-spline bolts with custom made parts. This completed, the print was shipped out and went to QA for final quality control. The new replacement display is a slightly modified version of the old one. The biggest visual change is that we are moving the backlight from the top of the display to the side. This has the following benefits: It makes it impossible to block the display from outside view. All views of the display, even in our warehouse, can be seen.
