Autism spectrum disorder and maternal smoking during pregnancy: a population-based study. Autism spectrum disorder (ASD) is a relatively common neurodevelopmental disorder of unknown aetiology. Evidence from animal studies suggests that the risk of ASD is increased in individuals who were exposed to maternal cigarette smoking in utero. We examined whether maternal cigarette smoking during pregnancy was associated with risk of ASD. We conducted a population-based cohort study using Scottish population register data between 1 January 1990 and 31 December 2007. The cohort was linked to record-level data from the Scottish Morbidity Records held in the Scottish Health Services Research Unit. Cases of ASD were identified from the Scottish Morbidity Register. We used standardised multivariable logistic regression to examine the association between maternal smoking during pregnancy and risk of ASD. The primary analyses were adjusted for confounding factors that could be assessed from the linked population data. We also explored potential modifying effects of maternal postnatal smoking and preterm birth. Compared with non-smokers, maternal smoking during pregnancy was associated with a 35% increased risk of ASD (adjusted odds ratio (OR) 1.35; 95% confidence interval (CI) 1.18-1.54). This association was strengthened after stratification for preterm birth (adjusted OR 1.45; 95% CI 1.26-1.67). The associations between maternal smoking during pregnancy and ASD were stronger for anencephaly (adjusted OR 2.69; 95% CI 1.45-5.02) and spina bifida (adjusted OR 1.81; 95% CI 1.10-2.98) than for other non-encephalomalacic diagnoses. Our results provide further support for the hypothesis that maternal cigarette smoking during pregnancy increases the risk of ASD."And we've seen from the comments they've seen it too," said Shari, one of the three dozen or so people from around the state who have come to the state Capitol to protest Gov. Dave Heineman's plan to close two inpatient mental health centers in southeastern Minnesota. The legislature just passed a bill that will allow people to help hospitalized patients in their communities by caring for them at home or in

Q: Bonding: "Bonded" or "bonded"? Does it sound ok to say "The chips have bonded" or "The chips are bonded"? A: Since the chips are already bonded together, the phrase would be "The chips are bonded." (Bond and bonded as a compound are used for a physical object that is attached to another, but does not consist of it.) However, "the chips are bonded" also fits with the fact that the chips have formed a part of some larger structure, but a chip by itself is not sufficiently large to be described as bonded. A: If you're speaking of the process, you could say "They are bonded" In electronics, bonding involves the process of making a connection between two devices. Source: Merriam-Webster If you are speaking of the state of these small circuit elements, which are not attached to anything else, and are part of some larger circuit, then you should use the singular "bond" Electronics: The wire should be bonded with solder, gold, lead, or any other conducting material.
